Any financial conflict of interest should be listed on a public database, like ORCID, with a link to each person's COI list shared in paper COI sections. The editor should then decide which of these COIs are explicitly mentioned alongside the link, erring on the side of caution

COIs are hard, so we should be as transparent as possible. I know of a few people who are trying to torpedo lines of research with critical articles, but fail to disclose the patents they hold for competing interventions that they're currently working on behind closed doors

Transparency

 David M. Sabatini @DMSabatini

There should be a centralized database where we can file all our potential conflicts of interest and which can then be accessed by institutions, journals, etc. I am constantly filing potential conflicts using differing formats and there has to be a better way to be transparent.

We need both academic-industry collaboration and transparency about it. Very disappointing that someone with such influence (and accomplishment) would be so careless. Impossible to justify. nytimes.com/2018/09/08/hea...

I've been waiting for @ORCID_Org to do this. Simple, one time solution. #Nomoreforms. Declarations won't work.

I agree. It's impossible to keep up. When I've asked journals to give me language to report COI, they can't. Everyone is just looking for us to check boxes to cover themselves

As an aside, I do like the idea of having your ORCID have a Col statement that is regularly updated so people can make their own judgement. We'd just need people to update it regularly
